Gps Pro Version 110815 For Viamichelin X950.Q: In C++, how to access a member function of an object that is stored in a vector? I have a class like this: struct MyClass { int data; MyClass(int data) { this->data = data; } bool isValid(int data) { return data > 0; } }; Now I want to add objects of this class to a vector: vector vec; MyClass obj(123); vec.push_back(obj); This will not compile because the method isValid() is not a member of MyClass (I can't use MyClass::isValid() because that would give a function call during compilation). It looks like I cannot add the method to the class in that way. How can I add methods to the object, that are added to the object? A: By default, methods are not added to classes. You have to declare isValid() as a member function. Then you can access your member functions through obj. class MyClass { public: int data; MyClass(int data) { this->data = data; } bool isValid(int data) { return data > 0; } }; int main() { MyClass obj(123); cout data = data; } bool isValid(int data) { return
